Here the Painter has by a poetical licence changed Maria's little dog into a lamb, as more emblematical of innocence - thereby following the example recently set him in a certain place, where - it is said - a Noble Lion underwent a similar metamorphosis.' [35.5 x 26.5 cm; depicts in the attitude of Maria in the proper landscape Queen Adelaide of Saxe-Meiningen, wife of William IV, glaring at lamb with 'Irish Coercion' written on it; other explanation: Curator's comments Text from 'An Illustrative Key to the Political Sketches of H.B.', London 1841: When Tristram Shandy saw Maria sitting on a bank, playing her vespers upon her pipe, she had a little goat beside her; but, when she was afterwards seen by Yorick, 'her goat had been as faithless as her lover, and in lieu of it she had got a little dog, which she kept tied by a string to her girdle.' In this sketch Lord Brougham represents Maria; the Irish Coercion Bill, such as prepared by his Lordship, is to be supposed to have disappeared, and its place to be supplied by a very harmless creature, not a dog, (for he would not have been a fit emblem of the harmlessness of the substitute,) but a lamb, which H.B. has been under the necessity of adopting, to suit the circumstances of the case. Henry Peter, 1st Baron Brougham and Vaux] 2x
